FOLD

Domestic servitude is a form of human trafficking found in a private residence. Victims are not free to leave their employment and are often abused and underpaid. They do not receive the basic benefits and protections commonly extended to other groups of workers – things as simple as a day off. Moreover, their ability to move freely is often limited and employment in private homes increases their vulnerability and isolation. Domestic workers, especially women, confront various forms of abuse, harassment and exploitation, including sexual and gender-based violence. These issues, taken together, may be symptoms of a situation of domestic servitude.
